FADE IN:

INT. STUDY ROOM - NIGHT

A male who won't be seen is sitting at a computer desk with his back turned, wearing all black, with a hood over his head. He's in deep thought, writing something on a piece of paper with a quill pen.

The candles burning on the desk illuminate the room.

PERSON (V.O.)

With the right title and voice, people will automatically believe the words being said or read. This is because people need something to believe in. It's not because it's right or wrong. People feel they need to fit in with the biggest following, believing if they abide by the rules, the consequences for breaking those rules won't be inflicted on them if they break them. You're probably thinking I'm insane, and that's only because you're not looking at the big picture. Take a look at laws and religion. They're meant to keep peace, but you have those who believe laws and religion are meant to create chaos because who says I can't do or say what I believe is right in my mind? Rules in religion shouldn't be defiled and the law shouldn't be broken. But that's not what's important. What's important is... Who said these laws and rules are correct? Who decided these rules are what humanity should live and abide by? Can anyone honestly say they know for a fact they know who the first person was who wrote the laws in both religion and what the world revolves around? And as time goes on, there's always a new law added, and a rule in religion is broken to fit what's going on in the world. Emotions come into play if you're a follower of the rules and proper judgment doesn't get administered for a crime you believe is wrong because of the rules you believe. And then there's the people who feel a punishment was placed on an innocent person because they believe the person who is being labeled as guilty wasn't wrong for what they did. In an ironic nutshell, both parties gain recognition, and it leads back to what is the purpose of laws if they can easily be broken or changed, and no real consequence or reward comes with it?

(Sly laugh)

But... That's not the message I want you to hear. I'm curious if you'll support my petition. Even if you don't... I know there's millions who will, and there lies the beauty of having a huge following. So... Tell me what you think.

INSERT PAPER

The calligraphy letters are written in blood.

PERSON (V.O.) (CONT'D)

People will no longer be charged with hate crimes because it's a human emotion that needs to be expressed, so people can understand why you're the person you are.

(Sinister laugh)

This will either create war or peace. I truly don't care. But... It'll make people take off the mask of what they follow and embrace what can easily happen to them. Who's with me approving this message?

He drops an American flag pendant on the paper, and before he stands up from the desk, he slams the quill pen inside of the temple of a dead body with the head propped on the desk.

He's heard walking off,

"You're either a follower, leader or you stand alone for what you believe in. You have a brain for a reason."
